Bryan Crable (Ph.D., Purdue University, 1998) is Associate Professor and Chairperson in the Communication Department at Villanova University, and the Founding Director of the Waterhouse Family Institute for the Study of Communication and Society. His scholarly research places Burke’s rhetorical theory in dialogue with existential phenomenology and communication theory, and focuses attention on the relationship between the self, language, embodiment, and community. His book on Burke’s relationship with novelist and critic Ralph Ellison, Ralph Ellison and Kenneth Burke: At the Roots of the Racial Divide, is scheduled to be published by the University of Virginia Press in Spring 2012. In addition, he has published a dozen chapters and articles in such journals as Rhetoric Society Quarterly, Quarterly Journal of Speech, Rhetoric Review, Argumentation & Advocacy, Human Studies, and Western Journal of Communication, and has won numerous awards from the Rhetoric Society of America and the Kenneth Burke Society.
